Successful publishing in English for Social Scientists: Manuscript Preparation and Review Workshop

Purpose and structure of the workshop

This workshop follows up on an initial session in 2015. Participants will consider the differences between strong and weak manuscripts, good and bad reviews and realistic and unrealistic plans for their own writing.

Building a strategic approach to writing and publishing in English is increasingly important in the social sciences. It requires good preparation, patience and persistence. In this workshop Professor Howitt will focus how to write a good journal paper.

2015 Workshop materials are available for participants to assist in preparation, and all participants are asked to prepare a short statement in English of what they will be aiming to publish in English and what they see as the biggest challenges they face in achieving their goal.

PART I: What sort of writer are you?

discipline expectations, journal requirements, personal preferences, reader interest

PART II: What are you writing for?

reporting original research, synthesizing existing studies, translating research already reported in Japanese, responding to other research

PART III: Preparing your manuscript

good practices need to be worked at – in this part of the workshop we will discuss how people feel they do their best writing.

PART IV: Submitting your paper

how to submit in ways that foster success – submitting to the journal, following up with editors, responding to reviews.

PART V: Maximising its impacts writing that get reads is the best sort of writing!

What does a good paper look like in your discipline?

abstract; keywords; figures; tables; maps; data; quotations; long sentences; big words?
can you tell if your writing looks like good writing?

Are there different expectations for an original research paper, review paper, commentary?

Make sure you are on the right path from the beginning of your preparations.

How does good writing happen?

How, when and where do good writers produce their good writing?

Is getting published really enough?

Making sure people know your paper exists is always important. Reputable publishers will help you get this right.
